

My process for creating my piece of satire was complicated. At first, I thought I couldn't replicate the CBC website, and I didn't do much work for the first few days. All I did was add some headers at the top of the page. However, it was the first few days that helped me get going. After replicating the headers of the CBC website very accurately, It helped motivate me to move on. I created a story (you can see it if you open the index.html file with textEdit and scroll to the very bottom), but it wasn't as much of a news article as it was a story with some elements from news articles. I then moved onto the current website, researching some of these claims, and their origins and incorporating them into the website. I went for the more "extreme" side of the spectrum for these theories, but that's to increase the impact it has on the audience.
